Dear Hiring Manager,

The paralegal role at Charlotte Tilbury is relevant to my background because, while my experience sits in disputes and regulatory matters, the core of paralegal work is consistent across sectors: managing documents and deadlines carefully, drafting clearly, and supporting a legal team under pressure. I want to move into an in-house environment, and a fast-growing consumer brand is a practical place to develop commercial legal experience alongside the disputes work I already have.

At BCLP, I supported a complex investment arbitration over six months. I reviewed and organised evidence for procedural submissions, drafted procedural orders and procedural histories, and maintained structured electronic case files across a matter with competing deadlines. Shortly before a significant submission deadline, I became the only junior supporting the team. I coordinated outstanding documents, tracked actions, and helped ensure the submission went in on time. The feedback I received from the supervising partner and associate was that my performance was comparable to a newly qualified solicitor. That experience taught me what it means to manage a high volume of documents carefully when the margin for error is small.

My time at Adobe gave me direct exposure to in-house legal work. I reviewed and amended software licensing agreements, assessed data-processing and confidentiality provisions against UK and EU GDPR requirements, and liaised with sales and business teams to resolve contractual queries. I also prepared an internal presentation on breach-of-contract risks for a non-legal audience, which required translating legal analysis into something immediately usable by colleagues without a legal background. That kind of communication sits at the centre of in-house paralegal work, and it is something I have continued to develop at Citizens Advice, where I regularly translate complex statutory rules into clear, practical guidance for clients.

I want to work in-house because I am interested in how legal work connects to the commercial decisions a business is actually making, rather than arriving after a dispute has already started. Charlotte Tilbury is scaling across multiple markets, which means the legal team is likely handling a varied and fast-moving workload. That is the kind of environment where I think the organisational habits and drafting discipline I have built will be genuinely useful.

Yours sincerely,
Maria Silva
