Dear Hiring Manager,

I am applying for the Residential Conveyancing Paralegal role at Lipson Lloyd-Jones. My year at BCLP, where I worked across both arbitration and real estate disputes, gave me practical exposure to leasehold issues, landlord and tenant disputes and the documentary work that runs through property matters, and I want to build on that foundation in a transactional conveyancing context.

At BCLP's Real Estate Disputes team I reviewed documents and prepared electronic bundles for contested property hearings, conducted legal and factual research on rights of light, easements and leasehold structures, and maintained matter records across several files with competing deadlines. I also drafted client notes and assisted with court filings, which required careful attention to procedural requirements and accuracy under time pressure. While disputes work is not identical to transactional conveyancing, the underlying skills overlap: reading title documents carefully, tracking the steps from instruction to completion, and keeping clients informed at each stage.

At Citizens Advice I have since managed matters from initial client interview through to submission, drafting correspondence, preparing document schedules and maintaining confidential case records. Many of the clients I advise are in housing-related situations, so I am familiar with explaining complex procedural requirements clearly to people who are under significant stress. That experience has sharpened how I communicate difficult information in a way that is practical rather than legalistic.

What draws me to this role specifically is the complexity the firm handles: leasehold structures and Building Safety Act legislation are areas where technical accuracy matters and where errors at the transaction stage have serious consequences. My LLM research on regulatory frameworks across jurisdictions, combined with the document-heavy environment I worked in at BCLP, means I am comfortable working carefully through dense statutory material and applying it to a specific set of facts. I am ready to take on a hands-on caseload and to develop the residential conveyancing expertise this role requires from day one.

Yours sincerely,
Maria Silva
